

I noticed that my spouse can log in to the website's members only areas, but I cannot, unless I use my spouse's username and password. Why do we have to share one set of login information when we are both members?

1. This old policy was changed in January 2017. From then on, any member can have their own login credentials just by asking. Send your request to the Webmaster, Jerry Budnick, at buds5@comcast.net. I'll need your name and the email address you'd like to use to receive emailings from the club.
2. So why do you need to ask, rather than just giving this capability to everybody? Well, I've gotten feedback both ways, with some folks being perfectly happy with a shared username/password and just don't want to keep track of yet another set of credentials. And about half of our member spouses (nearly 100) don't have email addresses, so I wouldn't be able to contact them easily with their usernames/passwords. For those reasons I figured I'd try to keep everyone happy and just give them out to those who really want it. That'll keep costs down too, by not paying for website access that won't be used.
